In his latest collection of photographs, titled "Kos of You," Georges Exertier invites viewers to confront their own biases and preconceptions about beauty, identity, and the male gaze.

Through a series of intimate portraits, Exertier challenges traditional notions of masculinity, showcasing a diverse range of men who defy societal expectations and embrace their own unique sense of style and self-expression.

Exertier's subjects are not the stereotypical male models with chiseled features and perfect bodies. Instead, they are everyday men of all ages, races, and backgrounds, each with their own unique story to tell.

By photographing these men in their own environments and on their own terms, Exertier creates a sense of intimacy and vulnerability that allows viewers to connect with them on a personal level.

The result is a collection of images that is both beautiful and thought-provoking, inviting viewers to question their own definitions of beauty and to challenge the narrow and often unrealistic standards that society imposes on men.

Exploring Beauty and Identity

Exertier's photographs explore the complex relationship between beauty and identity. He challenges the traditional notion that beauty is something that is fixed and unchanging, and instead suggests that it is something that is fluid and ever-evolving.

By photographing men from all walks of life, Exertier shows that beauty comes in many different forms and that there is no one right way to be beautiful.

Exertier's work also explores the role that identity plays in our perception of beauty. He shows that our own experiences, beliefs, and biases can influence how we see others and how we define beauty.

By confronting our own biases, we can begin to challenge the narrow and often unrealistic standards that society imposes on us.

Challenging the Male Gaze

Exertier's work also challenges the traditional male gaze, which objectifies and sexualizes women.

By photographing men in a way that is both intimate and respectful, Exertier invites viewers to see them as individuals, rather than as objects of desire.

Exertier's work is a powerful reminder that men are not just objects to be looked at, but are complex and multifaceted individuals with their own unique stories to tell.

A Call for Empowerment

Ultimately, Exertier's work is a call for empowerment. He invites men to embrace their own unique sense of style and self-expression, and to challenge the narrow and often unrealistic standards that society imposes on them.

Exertier's work is a reminder that beauty is not something that is fixed and unchanging, but is something that is fluid and ever-evolving.

By challenging our own biases and preconceptions, we can begin to see beauty in all its forms and to create a more inclusive and equitable society.
