Shawnee Sunrise Jeanie Johnson is a renowned Native American artist who has spent her life capturing the beauty and spirit of the American West through her vibrant and evocative paintings. Born in 1942 on the Shawnee Reservation in Oklahoma, Johnson's art is deeply rooted in her cultural heritage and personal experiences. Her work has earned her international acclaim and recognition, and it can be found in prestigious collections around the world.

Early Life and Artistic Beginnings

Johnson's early childhood was spent on the Shawnee Reservation, where she was surrounded by nature and the traditions of her people. She developed a love for art at a young age, and she often accompanied her father, a talented musician and storyteller, on his travels. Johnson's father encouraged her artistic pursuits and provided her with guidance and support.

In 1960, Johnson moved to California to study art at the Otis Art Institute in Los Angeles. She graduated with honors in 1964 and began her professional art career soon after. Johnson's early work focused on abstract expressionism, but she gradually shifted to a more realistic style that allowed her to express her connection to her Native American heritage.

Artistic Style and Themes

Johnson's paintings are characterized by their vibrant colors, bold brushstrokes, and evocative imagery. She often depicts scenes from the American West, including landscapes, animals, and Native American people. Her work is deeply rooted in her own experiences and observations, and she strives to convey the beauty and spirit of her subjects.
